Sue, Alan,

The CA forest practice rules have protective measures for natural resources and public risks to potential landslides. The California Geological Survey's Forest and Watershed Geology Program staff are designated as one of the timber harvest interagency review team members for which their primary concerns are the risk to the public from landslides.

Hi Alan,
I called Nick Kunz, CA SWRCB Forestry lead (copied here) to ask.

Nick – if you know if California Forest Practice Rules are protective of both natural resources (such as streams and water quality) and public risks due to potential landslides (OFP rules are protective of public risks but are not protective of natural resources) a reply to all would be greatly appreciated.

Thank you both!

Sue

One hour – we have a management meeting on CZARA with DC-EPA, DC-NOAA and R-10 Staff beginning at noon. I know this isn't practical, but if not today, any time in the next week.

Thanks.

Alan

Hi Alan –
I don't off the top of my head but will ask and get back to you.
(Still diving in to get to know the program!)
Any timeframe on this (today, end of week, etc)
Thanks and talk to you soon,
sue

Sue,

Do you know if California Forest Practice Rules are protective of both natural resources (such as streams and water quality) and public risks due to potential landslides. OFP rules are protective of public risks but are not protective of natural resources.

Hope all is well.
